Description

Specialized training in geriatrics and geriatric mental health is essential to meet the health care and educational demands of the growing population of elders. It is also important that the current and future workforce understand the diversity of the older population (e.g., ethnicity, race, geography, income, language ability) and be prepared to work on interprofessional teams in a range of clinical settings (e.g., nursing homes, assisted living facilities, hospitals).

The Consortium of New York Geriatric Education Centers pursues the objectives set forth by HRSA through a multi-faceted, competency-based clinically oriented training initiative, drawing on the alliances of our CNYGEC partners, geared to interprofessional training of health professionals, students, and faculty throughout New York State. We train health care professionals in the diagnosis, treatment and prevention of acute, chronic and life threatening diseases, disabilities and other health problems of older New Yorkers.

To implement this comprehensive statewide training initiative the CNYGEC draws on the extensive experience of our three academic partners which include Brookdale Department of Geriatrics and Palliative Medicine of Mount Sinai School of Medicine, New York University's College of Nursing and Columbia University's Stroud Center for Quality of Life and Aging. CNYGEC is also part of the NYS Coalition of GECs, which includes Finger Lakes GEC. CNYGEC is a long-standing and successful partnership of the original Columbia University-New York GEC and the Hunter/Mount Sinai GEC.
